GETTING READY

For Christmas—A Bad, Bold Man Makes a Raid on the Wardrobe of John Buckley

Saturday evening while the inmates were at supper, a bad, bold man entered the hallway at No. 33 East Second street and finding the coast clear passed on into the parlor, where he found Mr. Buckley's best spread out awaiting his coming.

He immediately proceeded to divest himself of his old and dirty clothing and put on the new toggery.

After being arrayed in his better garments he departed as quietly as he had entered, leaving his old rags as souvenir of his unwelcome visit. The outfit consisted of a cravenette, dress coat, hat and gloves, the whole amounting to $25 or $30.

A pair of pants belonging to P. Breslin were taken along but were discarded in the hallway of John Smith's cigar factory, not being up to the other line of goods.

The matter is in the hands of the Police.

of public information appear from the reports that they certain degree of success on of the municipal officials, who their own bookkeeping and draw own modest deductions as to at they have accomplished. The lightest analysis, however, puts all these cases of municipal operation in the list of financial or economic failures, and there ought to be some one in the department of state or the bureau of manufactures who would either take out the partisan color in these documents or insist that the consuls should reveal the truth.

Even with the best light put on these reports it is naively admitted that the Belfast system had broken down because of the unfortunate limitations imposed by the act of parliament in which the city was empowered to purchase and operate the system—that it should be self supporting and that no money should be taken for tramway purposes from any other fund. The receipts did not meet expenses, and it became necessary to raise fares all along the line. The companies in Huddersfield and Manchester made a somewhat better showing upon the face of the figures, but examination showed that their financial success was due to rates of wages which would not be tolerated in this country. In Huddersfield it is stated that "the 430 regular employees receive a weekly wage of $2.23." This would work out at $5.20 per week per employee. This would amount to $270.40 per capita per year and would require an expenditure of $116,323. In the United States as far back as the census report of 1902 16,338 motormen in cities of 500,000 and over received total wages of $10,509,456. This works out at $642 per man, or about 240 per cent of the average wages paid all employees in Huddersfield. If the scientific soundness of dividing the average number of employees by the amount paid is called in question we have the assurance of the census report that the median rate for all motormen in the United States was $2 to $2.04 per day. The significant fact, from a financial point of view, is that if wages in Huddersfield had been raised to the average wages of large cities in this country the surplus of $209,269 above operating cost would have been more than half wiped out and the demands for interest, redemption of debt and depreciation account could not have been met. Even as it was, with wages ground down to the starvation minimum, there was a surplus after charges and allowances of $31,700, which, with fine irony, is applied under the English system "to the relief of the general rates." Evidently the motormen who are receiving the princely wages of 75 cents per day are doing their share toward the "relief of the general rates," but may get a part of the money back if they become charges on the city.

If the advocate of municipal operation takes refuge behind the claim that conditions are different in England from those in this country, the claim may be freely admitted. But in making such a claim he abandons his case. The sole object in presenting alluring pictures of low fares and apparent surplus earnings on the English lines is to convince the American public that similar results could be obtained here. If the comparison contains no such suggestion, then it has no practical bearing on the effort to secure municipal operation in this country and is of the same academic interest as an essay on caravan routes in Mesopotamia in the time of Belshazzar. It is quite true that conditions in England differ radically from those in this country and that many of the features of English municipal operation would not be tolerated for one moment by the American public. The fares graded according to distance make short rides cheap, but long ones dear. They tend to congest the population in the tenement districts, while our system of a uniform fare tends to development of suburban property and the distribution of the working masses where they can find air and sunlight.

Even in such a matter as claims for injuries the Huddersfield traction system protects itself behind an insurance company and leaves the company to fight the claims as resolutely as its interest naturally demands. Municipal operation is far from having proved a success abroad, and if it had attained success abroad this would be far from proving the possibility of its success in the United States. To obtain a nominal surplus by keeping wages of operatives down to 75 cents per day will hardly appeal to any part of the American public.—Commercial and Financial Chronicle.

The Brownsville affair is again before the Senate. President Roosevelt sent special message to Senate, and Negro soldier confessed that colored troops shot up Brownsville. Senator Foraker, as usual, is siding with the outlaws and against the President.

The trial of Beach Hargis for the wanton murder of his father, Jim Hargis, is going to be a revelation in legal trickery, bribery and all the rascality resorted to in order to balk the arm of the law. It is openly known at Irvine that Mrs. Hargis, the boy's mother, has $30,000 in cash to purchase the young reprobate's acquittal.

TRUANTS

Throwing the Bones--School Children Engaged in Crap-Shooting

Had the City Truant Officer happened by the C. and O. toolhouse, just East of Bridge street, yesterday afternoon about 3 o'clock he would have run afoul of a group of five boys, whose ages ranged from 11 to 13 years, intently engaged in the exciting and pernicious diversion of "shooting craps."

The young gamblers were partly hidden from public gaze by the toolhouse on the East and a pile of railroad ties on the West, and nearby was a wood fire, at which they warmed and nimbled up their chilled and numb fingers.

They were all well appearing, being cleanly and neatly dressed, with bright and rather pleasing features, indicating a mother's care and attention, and who, good soul, no doubt believed her boy to be at school delving in his books.

They were unknown to the writer, else their parents would be informed of their truancy and misconduct.
